Hunting A Job

"I would like a situation, I have hunted for it long," said a youth who looked discouraged: "every thing that is, is wrong; there is no demand for labor, no respect for willing hands hence the people that are idle are as frequent as the sands. I have waited in the pool hall through the long and weary day, and no lucrative position seemed to come along that way; I have stood upon the corner, smoking at my trusty cob but no merchant came to hire me, though all knew I had no job; I have sat on every doorstep that against me wasn't fenced, you could scarcely find a building that I haven't leaned against; I have smoked a thousand stogies, I have chewed a cord of plug, I have shaken dice with dozens, I have touched each slder jug, to sustain my drooping spirits while I waited for a berth with some up-to-date employer who'd appreciate my worth. But the world is out of kilter and the country's out of plumb and the poor down-trodden voter finds that things are on the bum.
